A look at the region's Winners & Losers

Hanlon Brown Design

The Portland-based graphic design firm won three awards last month at the American Graphic Design Awards 2002. Hanlon Brown won for its work on Hip Furniture's web site, Marshall Wells Lifts' brochure and a direct mail piece for Tektronix. Hanlon Brown was founded in 1978 and has offices in Portland and Chandler, Ariz.

Oregon's kids

In its annual report card, Children First for Oregon gave the state a D grade in family financial stability. The agency cited the state's high unemployment rate, lack of affordable housing, lack of affordable childcare and the number of children living in poverty for the near-failing grade. Despite the low grade, the state still earned an overall B- thanks to high marks in health, safety and youth development and education.

Pollution Fighters

The Portland City Council last week lauded city staff and private citizens who have worked to prevent pollution in the past year. This year's Pollution Prevention Award winners are: Neha Patel, Health Care Without Harm; Tom Lujan, Bureau of Environmental Services; Ed Kerns; Marni Gluck, Portland Bureau of Maintenance; and Barry Messer, Portland State University.
